After reading Chapters 1 and 2, I think what stood out to me the most was how Freud believes that dreams have meanings behind them. I always thought dreams were just things that happened in our heads while we slept but Freud explains that they can actually connect to our thoughts, memories and things that happen during the day.

In Chapter 1, Freud talks about how people used to believe that dreams came from gods or spirits. What I found interesting was how he explains his way of understanding dreams. Instead of just looking at what happened in the dream, he tries to connect each part to something from his life. For example, he talks about his dream involving spinach, a woman and someone talking about his eyes. At first, I didn't really understand how any of those things were connected but he explains how they relate to his wife, money and even his childhood. I also learned that Freud believes dreams can show us things we want even if we don't realize it.

In Chapter 2, he explains how our minds put dreams together. He talks about condensation which is when our minds combine memories and thoughts into one dream. He also talks about displacement, where something in a dream takes the place of a thought or feeling. I thought this was interesting because sometimes we dream about things that don't make sense when we wake up.

I think what Freud is trying to explain ultimately is that dreams aren't just things we see while sleeping. There's a reason behind what we dream about and understanding those dreams might help us understand what we're thinking about without even realizing it.
